FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

MUSEUM EXHIBITION ‘HOW CATS TOOK OVER THE INTERNET’ EXAMINES THE PHENOMENON OF CATS ON THE WEB

Extended through February 21, 2016

Astoria, New York (Updated January 14, 2016)—That cats “rule the Internet” is an undisputed truism. Whether it be lolcats, Caturday, Lil Bub, or other Internet cat sensations, images and videos of felines have delighted many millions online. Museum of the Moving Image is currently presenting ***How Cats Took Over the Internet***, an exhibition that takes a critical look at the phenomenon of cats online and how they have transfixed a generation of web users. The exhibition, which opened on August 7, 2015, has been extended through February 21, 2016. (The exhibition was originally scheduled to close on January 31, 2016.)

Curator of Digital Media Jason Eppink, who organized the exhibition, stated “The Internet’s collective obsession with cats offers a window into the way we understand ourselves. This exhibition examines the many reasons for this deceptively frivolous phenomenon and highlights the new ways we’re creating, consuming, and sharing culture.”

Located in the Museum’s amphitheater gallery, How Cats Took Over the Internet will feature a selection of Internet cat videos, GIFs, and images, presented through the critical lens of concepts like anthropomorphism and the aesthetics of cuteness, the framework of the Bored at Work Network, and the rise of user-generated content. A multimedia timeline will capture significant moments of cats online, appended with a historical look at the representation of cats in photographs, film, and other visual media. Interactive stations will allow visitors to experiment with creating their own lolcats and to contribute their favorite cat photos, GIFs, and videos to the exhibition. In addition, the exhibition will include a world map of international animal memes by The Civic Beat, a collective of researchers and writers focused on civic technology.

In the adjacent video screening amphitheater, a selection of significant cat videos, organized by Will Braden, curator of the Internet Cat Video Festival (based at the Walker Art Center in Minneapolis), will also be shown, projected in a continuous loop.

Friskies® is the Presenting Sponsor of How Cats Took Over the Internet.

For the final months of the exhibition, the Museum will present the following related events:

- The Story of Lil BUB with the celebrity cat and her “dude” Mike Bidrasky in person, with a related “Meet and Greet” fundraiser, and an ASCPA adoption event (Jan. 30)
- Mysteries of the Pussies: The Cat Films of Carolee Schneemann, a program of short films by the pioneering film and performance artist whose films often include her cats; with Schneemann in person (Feb. 21)
